

I think that phone companies like Bellsouth should allow people with outside phone companies to be able to get their DSL High Speed Internet Service. According to them to even qualify for DSL you have to be subscribed to their local phone service. There are many companies out there that provide DSL service. But thanks to Bellsouth only their customers can receive it. Sure they may own the "main lines" but still it is becoming an monopoly. They charge too much for their high priced services. I wish someone would do something about it. That's why people switch to other phone companies. Basically DSL service should be allowed without a local service plan from Bellsouth
